

Dear FCC,

I support net neutrality and hope that you act to protect the rights of all individuals who use the internet. There is an economic theory called the tragedy of the commons in which selfish individuals deplete or spoil a shared resource, acting contrary to the common good. This is so prevalent in our world today that it is naive to think things would be different for the internet if you were to abandon the important regulations that uphold net neutrality. Please consider the tragedy of the commons that you surely see evident throughout the US, and please protect the net neutrality law that protects our internet commons.

Thank you,
Lindsey Sexton
